4: Schram M-S (1911-1922) 1957 AE9 Monguor AE9

	PAGE
Burying of the dead	147
Confucianist burial of Monguors	148
Incineration of lamas	148
Funeral of the shamans	148
XIV. Cult of Heaven	149
The meaning of the formula "Heaven and all the spirits"	149
Behavior of the Monguors towards Heaven	150
Prayers and offerings for Heaven	151
Cult of Heaven among the Turkic-Mongols	152
Impact of foreign religions in Central Asia	154
Impact of Nestorianism among the Mongols	154
Nestorianism among the Monguors	155
Conclusion	156
XV. Religion and the cohesion of the clan	157
XVI. Conclusion	159
Policy of China toward Lamaism	159
Failure of Lamaism to transform the Monguor society	160
Index	163

Sodalities, most of them for women, are organized in every village. The members convene to recite the Om Mani as they circle the Bumkhang [1] of the village all day. Whenever a Monguor is in serious trouble, he prays Om Mani, and when a happy event occurs, he gives thanks by Om Mani. Supposedly, all kinds of evil are dispelled and all blessings obtainable by Om Mani.

Monguor families place in the center of their courtyards a high pole with a small flag flying from atop it. Om Mani and other prayers are printed on the flag as an offering, day and night, by the family to Buddha. Prayer wheels, containing hundreds of repetitions of Om Mani printed on paper, are moved by water power, so that Om Mani will be offered continually, as the wheels revolve.

The Monguors have used their Om Mani to such an extent that its true meaning no longer exists. A farmer becoming angry at the lazy oxen, while plowing his fields, will beat them and swear furiously with a well-articulated Om Mani; gamblers, on losing the game, their patience wearing thin, will say Om Mani in a blasphemous tone. While weeding fields, if a lascivious song is enjoyed, farmers say Om Mani, meaning the song is well sung. When a smutty joke is told, listeners will say Om Mani, laughing, to indicate it is a good joke. It is said that thieves and robbers say Om Mani as an aid to their practice of larceny. Foreign travelers jest that, if robbers kill their victim, he will have the consolation, when dying, of hearing the killer saying Om Mani. Om Mani can be and is offered under all circumstances: riding horseback, working in the fields or at home, while laughing, gambling, singing, conducting business, and even sleeping.

The Monguor's fondness for and promiscuous use of Om Mani has reduced it to a mockery of its original intent. Nevertheless, it is in fact most often used as a real prayer.

The Monguors are not ashamed to pray in public, to

[1] A structure at the entrance to the village to prevent the entrance of evil influences.

[p. 58]